

We're going to a number of sites, and we won't always be together. The single largest problem faced by people who manage the sites is – yes, I'm sure you've guessed – damage caused by visitors, even though it's usually unintentional.

Whenever you do go to a site, don't forget you can learn many things from observing at a distance instead of walking all over it. This can really help to reduce visitor pressure. People often say, 'Well, there's only two of us and just this one time', but maybe thousands of people are saying the same thing. Q36

And then some basic rules to guide you – we'll have our own camp near a village, but remember never to camp on a site if you go on your own. It may be disrespectful to the people of that culture, and certainly don't make fires, however romantic it may seem. It's Q37 really dangerous in dry areas, and you can easily burn priceless undiscovered material by Q38 doing so.

So, how are we going to enjoy the rock art on our field trip? By looking at it, drawing it and photographing it – NEVER by touching it or even tracing it. Rock art is fragile and precious. Q39

Remember that climbing on rocks and in caves can destroy in a moment what has lasted for centuries. So no heroics in Namibia, please! Try to be extra careful and help others to be too.

And lastly please don't even move rocks or branches to take photographs – you should leave the site intact – I'm sure I can rely on you to do that. Q40

Well, that's about all I want to say before today's first discussion, but if you have any questions please ask them now – and don't forget you'll find some fascinating information about world-wide sites on the Internet. Right, first question then?
